Curatorial Portfolio

Curating = curiosity, care, collaboration & generosity

My curatorial philosophy is driven by the origin of the word curator and curating: the Latin curare, taking care, which makes the curator, in the first place, a caretaker. Coming from an artist's family, the respect for the artist and good collaboration are important starting points. This background, together with my artistic practice, allows me to approach art from different points of view.

My shows are driven by a profound curiosity in discovering the unknown or unacknowledged and bringing this together in new collaborations. Research is therefore another important element for which I'm specifically interested in cross-, inter-, and transdisciplinary collaborations, for instance between art and science, or art and architecture. Currently, I'm researching how I can use my experience in art and project management to support humanitarian aid.

In my group shows, I always like to combine well-known artists with lesser-known, forgotten, ignored, or upcoming artists. This creates a different, generous kind of dynamic that tries to move away from any prejudices and opens up to unexpected discoveries.

Symposium and exhibition Art-forms at PXL-MAD

Publication

For this tribute to this collective, the subject of my art history thesis of 1989 was turned into a bold statement. Jo Klaps and I decided not to opt for a clean, chronological approach, but to celebrate the colourful diversity the collective was known for.

As a tribute to Bruno Latour, I choose the underlying theme of 'composition'. Written phonetically in Esperanto, it alluded to the importance of border-crossing and the collaboration between human and nonhuman.

Curator

Organised during the full Covid period, this project set off a profound collaboration with artist Pierre Mertens.

His large-scale paintings of children with untreated hydrocephalus aim to draw attention to a global health problem that affects about 1 million children every year.

To give them better exposure, the paintings were also shown during Watou23.

We also organized an edition of his project Bolero in 2021, and are currently working on his upcoming project Covers.

ENSEMBLE
Abbey church St.Ouen, Rouen, F
01.07 - 03.09.23

Curator, researcher, concept, writer

Artists: art, architecture, and design graduates from all art and architecture schools in Normandy.

The invitation card showed the play of light through the church windows on the floor, which was an important inspiration.

I developed a specific scenography featuring a large 25-meter-long plinth for the central nave of the church to display maquettes by the architecture graduates.

For the repainting of the existing exhibition walls in a stone color that diverges from the traditional white box, I successfully secured a sponsorship from Sikkens France.
